Although much of the technology is new as free mp3 audio book sample or purchased downloads are the product wave of today the concept started over a hundred years ago, in part. First the inventor group led by Thomas Edison came up with the first sound devices on the copper cylinder. Walt Disney came up with the first animated movies. Some say the English were the first to drum up the audible book concept for injured war veterans during World War 1. They made recordings for them in hospitals where they were recuperating. Vinyl records were extremely popular for many years and the industry evaporated overnight with the introduction of cheap small tape players. People who had eyes were more interested in the early movies, although they had no sound other than piano or organ players located somewhere in theaters. The first crank type record players had the horn type speakers you now see in museums. These were considered brilliant science breakthroughs at the times and they were. The blind population must of especially enjoyed them. Eight track players were the rage for a few years but soon gave way to tape and very available free music from am and fm radio stations. Boom boxes eventually spawned the rap or talking entertainment for a large listening market. Someone somewhere now came up with the creative idea, in my opinion, for the talking audio book from this style of entertainment that is the offshoot of actual music itself. Now you can learn a second language or listen to a good fiction book in your quiet room at home. You can download an audio book and put it on a cd to entertain your teenagers while your family is driving someplace on vacation. You can learn from Zig Ziglar how to get a selling point or program across while driving to work or an actual sales call appointment. You can listen to a new novel story like, Plan of Attack by Dale Brown that could happen in this day and age.
