

How To Get the Best Of the First Sixty Seconds

The exciting part about initiating an impromptu conversation with men is its spontaneity. Making that first move with the man who catches your attention, whether at the grocery or at the checkout counter at Blockbuster video, will require quick wit and a disarming composure - and you need to cram it all in the first sixty minutes of contact. Pick-up lines can either take off or fall flat, depending on what you say and how you say it. Men love men who are great conversation initiators, and as long as you survive the first minute with flying colors, your feet are practically right at the doorstep of a potential relationship. Don't hesitate. Your body language will telegraph your composure before you even open your mouth; and hesitating can only serve to your disadvantage. Think positive, relax your body, and talk to the guy like you've known him enough to put yourself at ease in his company. It is best to have an opener ready beforehand so you won't be at a loss with what to say before you say it. Forget tired openers like the weather or the long checkout lines, and make a comment which puts the guy's positive attributes in full focus. Say that you love his shirt and his well-built physique, or that you've been planning on reading the same book he's currently browsing over. This draws him into the conversation, enough to merit a response. Keep the balance of power equal between the both of you as much as possible. You may be the one to approach the guy and give him the heads up, but this shouldn't mean that you're willing to surrender yourself to his will. This is one of the few drastic mistakes a gay man can make - letting another guy slowly dominate the conversation, thinking that the playing field tips to his side, and that the other person is the one being evaluated, not him. You can cut a compliment to the quick by inserting an abrupt negative, enough to show him that you're both in it together without putting him off. For example, open the conversation by saying that you've read the book he's reading, but find yourself disagreeing on every point the author makes. This spices up your personality, since tension is always a turn-on. Don't dally around; the conversation is the result of a chance encounter - keep it short and simple. You should be able to get his number in the first few minutes if you can, and if you can't - well, that's life. Besides, the other person may be pressed for time, and each second you overspend on talking reduces your chances of hooking up a connection. Improvise. This skill can't be taught; you'll just learn it on your own as you go along. Improvising is similar to learning how to play a new instrument. Practice makes perfect. Pick-up lines are difficult to pull off at first, but with continuous practice you'll eventually notice that the men you meet let their guard down and get comfortable with you - a sure sign of a potential match.

About the Author

Just check out the <http://vod.gayemart.com> or <http://vod.gayemart.com/dispatcher/mostWatched> and we are sure you will not need anything to make your meeting exciting.

Source: <http://americanahost.com>